Considered by many scholars as America's foremost historian, Perry Miller is must reading for people who need a shot of intellectual stimulation in the morning to get themselves going. An authority on literature, religion, and law in America from the colonial period to the Civil War, he is perhaps best known as the founder of modern Puritan studies. This course uses Miller's work as a way to investigate both the intellectual (especially the religious) history of early America and the historian's (self-appointed) role as social critic, for much of Miller's work, involved though it is with the mental gymnastics of bygone ages, offers a critique of modern American civilization. The seminar is dedicated to the proposition that college affords one the opportunity to read and discuss great books, and no one has captured either the mind of early America or that exquisitely anguished perambulation through the psyche that we call thinking better than Miller. One caveat: like any controlled substance, Miller gives one's system quite a jolt; the class should not be taken by anyone who believes that the American minds can be understood by reading People and Cliff Notes.
