Course Description

In the nineteenth century, slavery would become an issue of national contention, leading to the Civil War, but it was much less controversial during the early period of American history; during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, every mainland American colony practiced slavery, and for much of that period there was little criticism of the institution by Euro-Americans. (Of course, slaves themselves were long critical of the practices that kept them in bondage.) In this seminar, we will consider together a variety of intersecting themes and processes, such as how early Euro-Americans came to embrace bound labor; how freedom for some came to depend on slavery for others; how systems of bondage varied over time and space; how the institution of slavery influenced the lives of Africans and Native Americans in the mainland North American colonies; how, in turn, those in bondage shaped the institution of slavery; and how anti-slavery thought developed in early America.

This is a research seminar, so there will be a heavy emphasis on actually doing history: asking questions about the past and answering those questions by gathering, analyzing, and arranging historical sources to make logical arguments. Primary sources—sources produced by the people who lived in the period we are studying—are crucial in this endeavor, but primary sources can be a challenge for those of us who study slavery, as relatively few written records created by people in bondage survive. In order to help you explore the wide array of sources that shed light on the lives and labors of people in bondage, I will introduce you each week to a different online database or archive of primary sources. You will use these databases to find primary sources that relate to our assigned weekly reading, and each week you will upload a source, along with a brief analysis, to our Learn@UW course page. This will create a mini archive of slavery-related sources for our class.

This seminar is structured to enable you to produce an original piece of historical scholarship: a research paper that uses both primary and secondary sources to make an argument about some aspect of slavery or freedom in early America. Throughout the semester, you will complete assignments to help you succeed on this final paper: brief weekly source analyses; a proposal of your final paper topic; a bibliography; an outline; and a rough draft. Each of you will also have the opportunity to facilitate one of our seminar discussions as well as prepare a brief presentation on the primary sources used by one of the secondary sources we read.

Objectives:

By taking this course, you will:

1) Understand how ideas about slavery and freedom shaped the history of the region that would become the United States.
2) Refine your oral and written communication skills.
3) Learn to plan and execute a major historical research project.
Format:

This course will meet on Fridays from 11:00 to 12:55. In each meeting we will discuss the assigned reading as well as the questions and sources posted to the group blog that week, and I will regularly use the last ten or fifteen minutes of class to introduce you to following week’s online primary source archive. Since we meet only once a week, it is imperative that you are present at each session. If you must miss a course meeting, please let me know in advance, and we will work out an assignment for you to complete in lieu of attending class.

Reading:

You will have reading assignments for the first eight weeks of the semester. This will help you understand the interpretive frameworks that historians have used to understand slavery and freedom in early America before you write your papers. The readings that are not from the required texts (listed below) will be included in the course pack. (Both the course pack and the required texts are on reserve at College Library.) Please complete all readings in full and spend some time each week before we meet thinking about how each reading relates to the other texts we have read. There will be no assigned reading after the end of October in order to enable you to focus on your research papers.

Required texts are to be read in full or nearly so (available at UW bookstore):

Selected articles, book chapters, and primary sources will be in our course pack.

Computer Policy:

I ask that you refrain from using computers during the discussion portion of class. The temptation to get distracted by things that are not related to class is simply too great. I promise that you’ll get far more out of this course if you use just a pen and a pad of paper. The one exception to this policy: you may use a computer for the final 10 to 15 minutes of class while we explore the new primary source database. Cell phones should be silenced and put away. (If you are a McBurney student who needs accommodation, please come talk to me.)

Requirements:

Course attendance and participation: 30%

Please come to class ready to engage with the material, your peers, and me. I expect you to read consistently, think through the assigned material prior to coming to class, and participate actively.

Discussion leader: 5%
You will be responsible for leading our discussion once this semester. The week you lead discussion, you will complete the required reading early and upload by Monday a series of discussion questions. (This will give your classmates time to think about them prior to our Thursday discussion.)

Primary source expert: 5%
Once during the semester, you will prepare a short presentation about how the author of the book we read that week used primary sources. What kind of primary sources did the author use? How did these sources enable the author to make certain arguments? As part of your presentation, you need to find one (or more) of the primary sources that the author used and bring it to class with you. (If the source you find most interesting is a manuscript that cannot be removed from a library or archive, then you may bring an image of it.)

Online contributions: 10%
Each week you will post on our Learn@UW site a primary source along with a brief analysis of that source. You will also read your classmates’ postings and comment on at least one of them.

Assignments leading up to final paper: 15%
These assignments, which consist of a paper proposal, a bibliography, an outline, and a rough draft, should be completed thoughtfully and on time.

Final Paper: 35%
This paper (approximately 15 pages long) will be graded on its coherence (does it have a clear argument?), use of sources (does it utilize both primary and secondary sources?), originality (does it say something new and interesting?), relevance (does it engage with ideas related to slavery and/or freedom in early America?), and polish (is it well-written and carefully edited?). Of course, we will discuss this paper, as well as the other course assignments, in more detail throughout the semester.

Course Schedule:

September 9: Introduction and Welcome

September 16: What is Slavery?
Readings:
Christina Snyder, Slavery in Indian Country (2012), Introduction
Orlando Patterson, Slavery and Social Death (1982), Introduction (course pack)

Online Sources: Yale Slavery and Abolition Portal (http://slavery.yale.edu/)

September 23: Native American Slavery
Readings:
Christina Snyder, Slavery in Indian Country (2012)

Online Sources: Newspaper Databases (America’s Historical Newspapers, Proquest Historical Newspapers, Accessible Archives Newspapers) via UW’s library webpage
September 30: The Context and Contours of African Slavery in Early America

Readings:

Ira Berlin, Many Thousands Gone: The First Two Centuries of Slavery in North America (2000), pp. 15-216

Online Sources: The Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade Database (http://www.slavevoyages.org/)

October 7: Visit to the Wisconsin Historical Society

Online Sources: The Geography of Slavery in Virginia (http://www2.vcdh.virginia.edu/gos/)

October 14: Slavery and Freedom: The American Paradox

Readings:

Online Sources: The Digital Archive of Massachusetts Anti-Slavery and Anti-Segregation Petitions (https://dataverse.harvard.edu/dataverse/antislaverypetitionsma)

October 21: Early Anti-Slavery—People, Print, Movements

Readings:

Gloria Whiting, “The Selling of Joseph: Slavery, Freedom, and Black Family Life in Samuel Sewall’s Neighborhood at the Turn of the Eighteenth Century.” (I will distribute this via email)

Samuel Sewall, The Selling of Joseph: A Memorial (1700) (course pack)

Online Sources: Archives of Maryland Online (http://aomol.msa.maryland.gov/html/index.html)

NOTE: Your two-page paper proposal is due today. This should describe your topic, the central questions you are asking about this topic, and the primary sources that will help you answer these questions.

Readings:

Online Sources:
   Runaway Slaves in Connecticut (http://runawayct.org/)

NOTE: Your bibliography is due in class today. This should include both your primary and secondary sources.

November 4: Individual Meetings with the Professor
   Your outline is due at this meeting.

November 11: Oral Presentations
   You will very briefly present on your final paper (5 minutes or so), discussing the sources you are using and the arguments you will make.

November 18: No class, as you will be working on your rough drafts.

November 25: Thanksgiving Break

December 2: Discussion of Rough Drafts
   You will meet with the students in your draft-exchange group and together discuss each of the circulated drafts. Please note that you need to have prepared written comments for each of the students in your group prior to this meeting.

December 9: Formal Research Presentations
