In the past half-century, the working-class in the United States has been transformed dramatically by the globalization of manufacturing, the rise of the service sector, changes in immigration patterns and women’s increased reliance on wage work. This course examines how scholars have understood those changes and their impact on workers and their relationships to communities, unions and the state. Readings have been selected not only because they chart innovative paths toward future study, but also because they engage older scholarship in interesting ways.

Seminar meetings are organized around an assigned book or set of articles. All students are expected to read the assigned materials before each meeting and come to class prepared to discuss that book in relation to other course material. On two class periods, each student will write a short review of the assigned readings. In addition, each student will choose two weeks in which they will introduce the readings by situating it within the existing literature on related subjects. The final assignment for the course will be a 20 to 30 page paper that elaborates a theoretical question raised by two or more of the weekly readings. Alternatively, students may choose to write a paper based on their own research into a theme related to the course material.

Four of the seminar meetings (2/25, 3/11, 4/11, & 4/15) are coordinated with open seminars sponsored by the Havens Center. Those events will take place in the Curti Lounge (5243 Humanities). Students should also plan to attend at least one of the two lectures given by each Havens Center visitor to the seminar. We have listed additional Havens Center events on the syllabus for your own interest.

Evaluation:

- Attendance and participation in seminar: 20%
- Introduction and leadership of two seminars: 20%
- Two Book Reviews: 20%
- Final Paper: 40%
