COURSE DESCRIPTION

Asian American history is an intriguing cultural production. It at once calls into question the privileging of certain ideas, events, and people from historical memory and elides the same from that memory. It both challenges and is complicit with dominant worldviews. These inclusions and exclusions generate, reinforce, and exhibit the social unevenness embedded in U.S. society and the larger world order. In addition to being a formative cultural production that is actively generating and contesting the make-up of our national memory, it is itself a documentation and marker of the processes by which selected people, events, and ideas are constructed to be the norms of society while others are relegated as minorities. More importantly, it demonstrates how the writing of history is a socially meaningful activity that contributes to how, what, and why we document and represent the way we do and how these “choices” reveal our understandings of how society operates. Rather than just an unmediated window into the experiences of Asians in the U.S., it asks why it is important to even document or overlook their experiences and why it is critical to consider and understand how and what is represented.

Asian American history, in this view, traces the making of the U.S. national identity and underscores how this formation is contingent upon how Asians in the U.S. are understood and remembered. It unfolds how the social, economic, and political development of the U.S. is deeply connected and influenced by the world at large. These linkages become comprehensible and are subsequently read through the movement of people, services, goods, ideas, and capital between the U.S. and various Asian countries. Asian American history further reveals how the make-up of the U.S. national identity is contingent upon the construction and interplay among identity categories such as race, nationality, gender, class, and sexuality – all of which are at work to make known and divide legitimate subjects of this nation-state from the illegitimate. The goal of this class is to unpack these complex series of processes involved in the construction of the U.S. national identity. As writings and media clips from various academic disciplines such as Anthropology, Sociology, English, and History contribute to and shape our understanding of Asian American history, we will critically examine these various texts to consider the narrative practices adopted in each discipline to tell story of Asian American history.

This course consists of weekly quizzes and three take home examinations. Students are also required to produce a final comprehensive analysis that demonstrate their mastery over key themes developed in this course.

COURSE POLICIES

Regular and prompt attendance, active participation, and mature attentiveness during seminar sessions are mandatory. The professor will not distribute lecture or discussion notes via e-mail for students who miss seminar sessions nor will lecture or discussion notes be posted on the course webpage. There are no excused absences.

Quizzes will always be administered during the first ten to fifteen minutes of class. There will be no make-up quizzes given, without exception. Assignments are always due during the first ten minutes of class. Any assignment received after the first ten minutes of class on the due date is considered late and will not be evaluated or credited. No late work will be accepted, without exception. No incompletes will be granted for the course except in cases of personal emergencies, subject to the discretion of the professor. Students are responsible for retaining a copy of all quizzes and assignments.

Please read the university policy on plagiarism. All information borrowed from print sources or the internet must be clearly identified and properly credited. Any instance of plagiarism or cheating on exams or quizzes will result in an "F" grade for the assignment and the course.

This course is open to a variety of ways of interpreting Asian American history and students are encouraged to share their readings and analysis of assigned texts. Since there will be differences and disagreements, students are expected to show respect to the comments and positions of the professor and your fellow students.

Each student is warmly encouraged to meet with the professor during office hours and by appointment.
