Subject of the course: The Indian Ocean is a fast emerging new field of study which, covering an area from East Africa, Egypt and the Red Sea to the Spice Islands of Indonesia, is as much Indian, Islamic, and Chinese as it is European overseas and world history. The traditional view of the Indian Ocean area has been profoundly altered by the historical work of the last twenty to thirty years. What once appeared to be a series of isolated trading enclaves on the fringes of vast agrarian civilizations has now been recognized as an integrated commercial system of great complexity, with the Indian subcontinent as its pivot, and taking up a large share of the world's total productive activity. New questions have begun to be addressed relating to the forms of economic, political, social, and cultural organization in the area. What was the relationship between the land-based states and maritime trade and port cities? What was the role of nomads and caravan trade in the arid and semi-arid areas bordering the Indian Ocean? How did, from the earliest times, cities develop, both inland and on the seaboard? What effect did great rivers and rivershifts have on the development of human settlement in India and the lands around the Indian Ocean?

While dealing with such questions in the broadest way, the aim of this course is to cover all periods of history and to give special attention to the geographical context in which historical developments occurred. This will serve to restore a picture of the historical interconnectedness of the Indian Ocean area.

Format: this is a seminar, emphasizing the discussion of reading materials, as well as the writing of book reviews, in addition to lectures presented by the instructor and some presentations by the participants.
