This course examines how health and illness have been gendered over the course of United States history with special attention to the twentieth century. We will be guided by several questions: How are gender roles for both men women central to the social construction of illness? How have conceptions of health and illness been used to build community, control behavior, and create health consumption? How do gendered constructions of health and illness create and reinforce racial and class divisions? How are ideas of health and illness forged by non-medical institutions and social movements?

The course has been organized into four units: 1) Gender, health, and medicine; 2) Gender and health activism; 3) Families: healthy and dysfunctional; and 4) Healthy living, damaged lives. Each of these units allow for an exploration of how gender influences the perception of health, the experience of illness, and the politics of diagnosis.

Requirements:

Seminar Participation	30%
Book Reviews (2)	20%
Essay Review	30%
Think Pieces	20%

Seminar Participation:

Participation in the seminar is important to the teaching and learning process and to your grade. It is not that I want you to speak for the sake of speaking, but I want you to accept some responsibility for teaching others by sharing your thoughts, questions, and ideas and for the direction and energy of the seminar. Students should have read and engaged both the assigned materials and the discussion questions before class.

Book Reviews:

Students will write two book reviews of books read for this course. They should be about 5 pages long and should summarize the scope of the book, the author's approach, methodology, and findings, and provide your own analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of the text. They are due within one week of the day the books were discussed by the class.

Essay Review:

Students will write an essay review of four or five books on some topic that fits within the larger themes explored in this class. This paper should provide reviews of each individual book, but more importantly, it should describe and analyze what these texts tell us about our current understanding of the topic in question. This paper should be about 15 pages in length. The first draft will be due April 22. The final draft will be due May 12.

Discussion Questions:

Every week students will write and post a "think piece" that somehow engages with the day's reading. The approach to these essays is wide-open; I only ask that they be designed to help us all think about these texts before class. You may, for example, respond to a stock question: "What do these texts tell us about the relationship between gender and illness?" or "What kind of political or cultural work did the diagnosis of [] serve?" Or you can ask a historical or historiographical question. Or you can explore an idea or claim you find particularly compelling. These essays may (but they needn't) connect each day's readings with other course materials. It's up to you. These are not meant to be reviews, summaries, or critiques. They are meant as explorations, either historical or historiographical, of the texts in question.

Students will post these questions to the class discussion list by 9 AM the morning of class. These questions taken together should not be longer than one single spaced page of prose. (Every student can have two skips.)
